THE NIGHT WIND. He riseth from the sea; the jewelled waves. With heaty feet glide from his path before; and midet how mirrantre from the coval awas. His shopeless generate float out to the shore. Lifting his wings from out their folded green, He fles beneath the starlight and the dew, Over the mountains and the plains of space, Where lies the Distance in her draperies bine.

With level front and coldness in his eyes,
He sweeps mross the hills where Nature stands,
And in mule scorning of her wild surprise,
He cause the blossoms from her clinging hands.
From off her formered and her bosom hare,
He tears the jeweis in his rechiess mirth—
And all the gene that shipe smidt her hair,
He scatters rudsly o'er the eager earth.

Then turning from her, he comes shouting down Upon the trees, who sized street with pride-Tears off the branches of the Maple brown, and lays the prond Onle on the green hill-side. The Ask, with tare, white arms, raised to the sky is still impleting, he scorms all the more—; hends down the Cedars with staltant cry, And bows to dust the grand old Sycamore.

Then growing gentler as the night wears on, His linguist innear by some contage low—
Where lies a madern, blushing as the daws,
With dreams upon her ayes, unfolding slow,
He reaves within her along the rarest things—
The brightest promites she even know—
Until the fluttering of his contless wings
Frights has from simular and her pillow too.

Then gathering up into his mighty breast.
The crimson leaves he scattered far and wide.
He bears them to a quiet place of rest,
Just where the Summer in her sorrow died;
And with a calmer air and slower pace,
Forth from the forest of or the plain he flits,
where proud Autumn, with a matchlessgrace,
L. on her purple throws in splendor sits.

Her flow. -the a thread of scaties, deep and bright, Veined , 'te her boson, damp with daw, is gathered. -th the darkness and the night. And heavy u. It of red and dripping leaves, Her hands are to 'ere with their sleepy syss, And dropping leaves, and the recogning As. They fade and wither, and their beauty dies.

and with his haughty hend low at her met,
The Night Wind greets her, with a grace most ra Wooing her gently with a unusic sweet—ills wings half fulded, stirring t. e soft air.
Drawing her tenderly within his arm. but he had been her former to be found as me. And growing bolder at her faint alarms, He southes with kiness all her fears and right,

But soon the watchful stare grow dim and pals,
And the mood waneth—while a solemn hash
Lies on the patient trees, who never full
To watch the waking of the young Dawn's blush.
Forth from the hills also glides with quiet steps—
A crimson glory trembling on her cheek—
A wavering splandor on her dawy lips—lier blue syse raised to Heaven, pure and meek. Before her path the Night Wind steals away, meters her pain tos Nigni wine steads away,

With reversut looks and stillness in his tread—
Heating the ments of his garments gray—
Twining his mantis o'er his half-howed issad.
Gestle and quiet as a little child,
Who stands at prayers beside his Mother's knee,
He winds his way across the moontains wild,
And in proud stience sinks tate the sea!

The Doctor and the Doctor's Son.

BY ANNIE M. LOVERING.

fitted than for the ministry—I mean as far as patience was concerned—yet it came into my throbbing and beating loudly at my heart.

(Concluded to morrow) the aid kitchen of my father's house with my little brothers and sisters about me (and indeed there was a goodly array of them,) that it was about time for me to be doing something in the world; something outside of the mondo-nous round of household duties which I performed day after day; something, perhaps, to relieve my father, in a small way, of the burden that rested upon his shoulders. By this I do not mean that he was in debt, or that his goodly term failed to give his family a comfortable, happy support. Not at all. But let that question go without further discussion, and suffice it by saying that for very good reasons of my own, I resolved as the old people say, "to make a start in the world"
And so I started. How that was brought about, it would be tedious enough to relate, but this much I will say, that because of the idea born to me so suddenly on that spring morning. I was chosen—of the numerous applications— teacher of the forty scholars at a distance of twenty miles from Cranston. I need not add that this was a source of great gratification to me, and that because of it I entered into a vast SCHOOL BOOKS, me, and that occases of it I entered into a wast number of wague, happy speculations as to how the summer would gibde away—how the days, the long summer days, would seem as short as the shortest winter ones—how I would teach the little children to love me, and by that means find a resolier way of interesting them in their bocks. Dear me! if would fill a good sized volume to write out all I imagined and dreamed of the summer which I was to spend in the little will have of Later.

escene of action:

"You are to teach in Lester village this summer, if I understand you rightly?" said the most gentlemanly of gentlemen before I left the cars at Lester.

The question was not an impertinent one after our brief, morning acquaintance, and so I answered in all good faith, a little pomponaly, perhaps, for I was greatly impressed with the importance of my calling.

"Yes, sir, and I anticipated a very pleasant summer of it." I said

"You do?" He spoke in a quizzieal tone, while the wiseat and most inexplicable of smiles crossed his that my question was abrupt, and my manner somewhat disturbed. "Nothing, only to realize your pleasant an-ticipations, you must meet a different fate than your predecessors for years back."

"And why, sir," I questioned, my face get-ting redder and redder every moment. "Because of all the children under the sun those of Lester village are the most unmanage-able. In the course of a summer they usually succeed in dethroning two or three teachers."

He was a very handsome gentleman, as I said before, and as he said this in a pleasant, have been quite amusing.

"They will not dethrone me!" BRAINERD & BURRIDGE WOOD from it food for his merriment, At that I grew queenly, or at least what I thought to be so, and drew myself up as though there was a question of honor to settle. Just then the cars came to a full stop, and the conductor gave his call "Lester!"—so that I did not have a chance to answer—not his words, for they were simply enough in themselves—but his manner. "I wish you much success," he said, as I left

"Thank you; your wish shall prove a That was the first I heard of my Lester school, and I need not add that my spirits were somewhat dampened. But that I should conguer the unruly set of masters and misses I did to ream Leut Cap to ream Leut Paper, gut and plain 200 reams Leut Cap

That was enough for me to know. I would make friends with the doctor's son at the be-ginning. But that was easier said then done,

I may as well contess at once. There was mis-chief enough in him to have stocked a little million of commonly requish boys. Gain an advantage over him in one way, and he was doubly sure to gain over me in another. If I attempted to reason with him, his answers would set the whole seboci in a hub-bub, and if I threatened to punish him, a look of sheer defiance settled upon his bright face. He troubled me so deeply that I could not rest night or day, in school or out. That I grew paic and thin is not to be wondered at. When my trial was at its height, I shanced to meet my acquaintance and prophet of the cars. Who he was, or what he was, I did not trouble myself to think. I did not even eare. I had hoped to meet him again, but I preferred to have it at the time or my victory, not at my vanquishment.

"And how are you pleased with your school!" he asked, walking by my side in an easy, care-less way, as though he was an acquaintance of "I am delighted," I answered. "I cannot express to you how much."

He laughed heartily. Looking into his face at that moment, I thought I could trace a very strong resemblance between him and the doctor's son, Frank Eldridge. A most unpleasant truth dawned upon my mind. A little angered, I determined to make the most of it.

"The scholars are very well," I said, half maliciously. "I suspect that the trouble lies with their parents. The ringlesder of all the mischief seems to have grown up in a most unbesithy atmosphere. I should say that his father was not a very devout friend of Sabbath Schools, and that would be a mild saying, in-Schools, and that would be a mild saying, indeed, and a charitable one on my part."

My words took immediate effect. A little flush of color appearing suddenly upon the gentleman's face, spoke plainer than words could have done. Seeing my advantage, I continued, in a tantalizing way:

"People tell me that this Eldridge boy has not known a mother's care since his earliest inforce. That is call-aggidant. I have been infancy. That is self-evident. I have been more lenient, remembering this. But if it is a mother's care that he needs, I would advise his father, most heartily, to make an attempt to secure to him the care of some good, true wo-"You would !" He looked me fully in the face as he asked the question. I was not equal to the ordeal.— I grew suddenly confused, and trying to answer m, stumbled upon three or four answers at the same time. Your advice is most excellent, Miss Lakin hope the unfortunate gentleman will be able o act upon it." "So do I, most sincerely," I answered, blushing beneath his strange questioning glance — For the boy's sake he would do well to make the matter one of importance until he suc-ceeds," I added, more because I would not allow myself to be silenced by this gaze, than because I cared to speak. "Perhaps you would be willing to aid the entleman in question, since you were the first o suggest the idea! Would you!"

"I am no philanthropist," I answered, curl-ly, believing that he was making an attempt to quiz. "I think too much of my his-"
I heaitated. I saw that I was going too far. The gentleman smiled. We were close by the chool house door, and the conversation could go no further. With a 'good morning,' be turned away, while I entered the school-room. "Who was that gentleman?" I asked of a child, standing by the door.
"Dr. Eldridge, Frank Eldridge's fatther," was the reply. Now for school-teaching I was no better I knew that well enough before, but hearing
